You’ve seen them around town, working on building roads and streets, collecting your garbage and helping out at local events. Chances are, someone you know is a member of this long-standing union.

You may see Local 942 members helping with traffic control in many community events around town. Pictured here with the mosquito mascot is (L to R) Tim Levit, Ali Fletcher-Nolan, Loki the French Bulldog (honorary member), Jennifer Hansberry and Patrick Robinson.

Laborers’ Local 942: Building Alaska Since 1946

Today, Laborers’ International Union of North America represents half a million workers in North America. Local 942 membership is nearly 1,000 strong and works in communities from Southeast Alaska, to military bases, to Prudhoe Bay, and many right in the heart of downtown.

The laborers of Local 942 build our communities as experienced construction craft laborers, public employees, federal sector workers and service contract workers. They are your garbage collectors, transit drivers, construction crews, maintenance and groundskeepers, hotel workers, neighbors and friends. They build roads, bridges, tunnels, and work on demolition and renovation projects. Members assist in the construction and maintenance of power plants and substations, dig trenches, repair roads, and build supporting infrastructure such as oil and gas pipelines. They service local community members and events at the Westmark downtown hotel, and all who visit downtown by clearing roads and keeping up with grounds throughout the year.

Signatory contractors, local, state and federal government, and downtown businesses know they have top trained, qualified and competent laborers when they work with Local 942. Through the collective voice of the union, industry standards rise, quality craftsmanship prevails and rights of all workers are respected.
